SUBJECT: Generative Entertainment Project

I am happy to report that our first foray into artificial intelligence has been a huge success! The Generative Entertainment Project promises to create vast quantities of entertainment at a fraction of the cost of human actors and screenwriters.

However, we have run into a few obstacles.

As you know, the GEP system doesn't innovate so much as "remix" existing content. That's proving to be a challenge, as more viewers who aren't sleeping through the movies might be able to identify the original elements.

For example, we asked GEP to generate sci-fi thrillers, and this is what it produced:
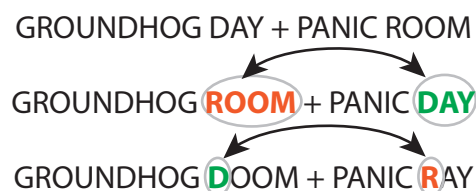

GROUNDHOG DOOM

A narcissistic weatherman is besieged by terrifying mutant rodents as he hides in a tiny shelter.

PANIC RAY

A woman and her daughter trapped in a time loop evade home intruders armed with futuristic, terror-inducing weapons.

It seems the system is taking a pair of popular titles and swapping one word from each, then swapping one letter at random from those two words.

GROUNDHOG DAY + PANIC ROOM

GROUNDHOG ROOM + PANIC DAY

GROUNDHOG DOOM + PANIC RAY

Then it creates a four-hour movie based on the original elements as well as the new title. We're working on the runtime problem, but right now, the more pressing concern is the source content. We'll need to identify the original titles to ensure that they're unique enough to avoid copyright infringement lawsuits.

I'm sure we'll have this problem resolved in short order. After all, the system rarely generates actors with more than six fingers on each hand now.

I don't think it's important, but one of the developers noticed that if you drop the letters from each title swap into the grid cells below, it spells out a quote from Alfred Hitchcock.
